

Susan Parriott Video Transcript

[Begin transcript 00:00:00]

Susan Parriott:

People are really desperate for information and looking for it wherever they can find it. And what I like about working with Doctor Gaugler is it's a true partnership, I feel like between the Alzheimer's Association and the University of Minnesota, because neither one of us can be everywhere. So when we can go somewhere and support one another, it's really nice. And, you know, there's a name and a draw with Doctor Gaugler and the University of Minnesota. So he's had some, I think, decent attendance at these events. But it's been helpful to have all the other community resource people that he's invited to be there so people have access to all kinds of resources, which is what you need when you're going through any dementia journey, whether it be Alzheimer's disease or another form of dementia. No one organization is able to serve and fulfill all of those needs. So bringing us all together is really crucial to them living well with the disease, which I think is what we all want for people.

[End transcript 00:00:59]